LATEST RESEARCH

Working Indigenous Australians

In an important collaborative partnership, the Workplace Research Centre has worked closely with the Aboriginal Employment Strategy Ltd, Generation One and Mission Australia to undertake a review of the current data challenges in the realm of Indigenous labour market analysis. The study emerged from a recognition, across all of the research partners, that current data collection methods surrounding Indigenous employment experience require significant revision. The report scopes the potential for improvements to data collection

Mia will address shifts in labour law from a European perspective. She will consider the controversial implications of the financial and economic crisis on labour law at EU and national level. In particular she will comment on developments in age discrimination and fundamental Treaty freedoms, including trade union rights and social dumping in the aftermath of the 'Laval Quartet' of cases interpreting those rights.

methods, and considers alternative options for future data collection. Particular focus is placed on the issue of career formation and development, and how the experience of Indigenous workers might be statistically better captured. The controversial issue of 'best practice' is also considered by the report. The report is divided into four core areas of analysis: (1) conceptual critique; (2) quantitative critique; (3) qualitative review of the best practice concept; and (4) final recommendations going forward. The final report emerging from this research collaboration has been released by Generation One. It is hoped that this research will prompt some lively discussion in realm of Indigenous labour market policy.
