My sincere thanks must go to the University of Sydney’s Department of Chinese Studies, especially its Chair, Professor Helen Dunstan, under whom I began my study of Classical Chinese, Dr Tim Chan, under whom I learnt much about Classical Chinese poetry, and Dr Derek Herforth, my supervisor both for this project and, before it, my honours year thesis on the Zhuang Zi 莛子. I believe that my understanding of Classical Chinese also owes a lot to my education in a number of other languages, not least my own. Accordingly, I also wish to thank Messrs Richard Blackett and Fox Morgan, the heads of Classics and English respectively during my time at The Scots College, Bellevue Hill, all staff in the University’s Department of Classics and Ancient History, in particular Associate Professor B. Dexter Hoyos, Dr Frances Meucke and Dr Suzanne MacAlister, and the Chair of the University’s Department of Indian Sub-Continental Studies, Dr Peter Oldmeadow.

Financial assistance throughout my M. A. year has been provided by the Federal Government’s Research Training Scheme, for which I am very grateful. I fail to see why such funding should be extended to so few.

I also wish to recognise the helpful flexibility offered by my place of employment, the New South Wales Government Cabinet Office, and the support of my colleagues as I carried out both full-time work and full-time study throughout my M. A. year.

Finally, I am greatly indebted to the thoughtful comments and suggestions which my great friends Alana Lessi, Hilbert Chiu and Robbie Moore, and my father Alex Jones have made in relation to this dissertation.
