The University of Sydney

Therapeutic Narrative

Illness writing and the quest for healing

Roslyn Brooks

A thesis submitted in fulfilment of the requirements of the degree of Doctor of Philosophy

Department of English
October 2004
Abstract

This thesis examines how narratives of illness become therapeutic narratives. The method is to engage closely with (mainly Australian) texts – literary accounts of illness – in order to identify key elements that effect a healing function (healing is distinguished from cure). Textual analysis is placed in the frame of medical information about the relevant conditions, and theoretical perspectives that provide a cultural and historical setting for illness writing.

Bio-medical discourse foregrounds the clinical process of diagnosis, investigation and treatment and relegates the personal meanings of illness to secondary place. The thesis explores ways in which the patient’s account provides an alternative discourse that supplements – and at times challenges – the medical discourse. Illness foregrounds the body, and illness narratives confront the reality of embodied experience. Illness that is chronic or incurable, ageing, physical and mental decline, and the inescapable prospect of death confront the patient with the need to find meaning in experience.

Narratives of illness may serve as ventilation, diversion or escape for the patient. They may provide practical help, information and consolation to family and carers, and others who suffer with the condition. These are valuable functions, but I argue that illness writing may embody more powerful therapeutic elements that transform and give meaning to the illness as part of the individual’s life story. Key therapeutic functions identified are perversity, empowerment and transformation. Healing can begin with the empowerment of telling one’s story. Illness stories may challenge the stigma and the subordination associated with disease. They can affirm a sense of belonging and community where illness intersects with other forms of marginalization. Powerful illness narratives are often characterised by perversity, overturning the assumptions of dominant cultural discourses – including those that place authority with the medical practitioner and demand acquiescence from the patient. The most powerful therapeutic narratives transform the story of illness into a new story.
Acknowledgments

There are three people without whose help this thesis would not have come into being. My husband Mike has unfailingly given encouragement and support, as well as practical advice from his own research experience. My daughter Katrina’s help with proof-reading and editing has been substantial, but most valuable to me was her enthusiastic interest in my topic. Above all I want to thank my supervisor, Noel Rowe, for his guidance, critical insight, intellectual stimulation and friendship – and not least for the wit and inspiration of his poetry.
Contents

Chapter 1 Introduction: the narrative context 1

Chapter 2 Inside stories: the narratives of medical writers 16

Chapter 3 The patient speaks 55

Chapter 4 Stories coming apart: ageing and dementia 89

Chapter 5 Women’s stories: illness and the female body 131

Chapter 6 ‘Night stories’: AIDS writing 166

Chapter 7 Strong voices, strong people: Aboriginal stories of illness 200

Conclusion 238

Bibliography 244

Presentation and Referencing Convention