Acknowledgements

This dissertation owes its conception, long gestation and birth to the encouragement and support of my supervisor, Nerida Newbigin. Nerida’s great love for the history, literature and art of the Italian Renaissance, and her passion for sharing that love with others, has been a constant inspiration for me over the years it has taken to complete my journey in the footsteps of Eleonora d’Aragona, the Neapolitan princess who married Ercole d’Este in 1472 and lived happily ever after with him in Ferrara. It has been a great joy and privilege to share my journey with her.

To my wonderful friends have always been there for me, although many of them have had no real idea what I was doing, or why, I say a big collective “thank you!” You know who you are, but I warn you that I might just take you up on your suggestion that you would like to read my story of Eleonora.

I thank the members of the Department of Italian Studies at the University of Sydney who have shown interest in my work, especially Giorgia Alù, who willingly accepted the challenge of being my Associate Supervisor in the latter days of this dissertation, giving me the benefit of her own recent experience as a doctoral student, helping me to look at my work critically and to effectively analyse my findings. To Emanuela Moretto for teaching me Italian and to Mariella Totaro for encouraging me in my work and for giving me the benefit of her philological knowledge, thank you. I am also grateful to art historian, Dugald McLellan, for giving me the benefit of his specialist knowledge and to classics scholar, David Fairservice, for his translations of Latin documents.
Several overseas scholars have contributed unselfishly to my research experience. The first of these is Dr John Davis Moores, whose unpublished doctoral thesis on Diomede Carafa’s correspondence fuelled my interest in Eleonora’s Neapolitan background in Naples and revealed the extent to which she maintained her contacts with her father’s court. I hope that my dissertation will encourage other scholars to take advantage of his work, which should then take its rightful place in bibliographies of the history of Naples and Ferrara. Other scholars encountered in the Archives and at conferences have been generous with suggestions and copies of their essays: Guido Antonioli, Sergio Mantovani, Micaela Torboli, Enrica Guerra, Dianne Ghirardo, Valerie Rees all have my gratitude.

Thank you to the staff of the Archivio di Stato in Modena, especially the former Director, Dott. Angelo Spaggiari, Signora Lucia d’Angelo and her colleagues in the sala di consulenza, who worked cheerfully often in very difficult conditions to provide me with the endless buste of documents that I required for my research. Thank you to Bepe in the laboratorio for the pages and pages of photocopying and his patience with my faulty Italian. Thank you to Dott.ssa Daniela Ferrari, the Director of the Archivio di Stato in Mantua, who received me with great courtesy and put the resources and staff of her splendid archive at my disposal. Thank you to the Interlibrary Loans staff of Fisher Library at the University of Sydney, and their counterparts in libraries all around the world, who managed to procure even the most obscure titles for me.

I owe a particular debt of gratitude to my friends in Ferrara: the wonderfully warm and hospitable Orlandini family, Adele, Andrea and Filippo, who have always made me feel so welcome at the Locanda Borgonuovo and who never failed to offer their assistance when even the most mundane of problems beset me. Their love for Ferrara and their pride in her golden past and her present cultivation and charm have been an inspiration over the years I have stayed with them. I owe a great debt to Silvia Villani, for her passionate love for Ferrara and its cultural heritage and for her generosity in making available to me books and other information that I could never have obtained otherwise. Thank you to Sandro Feggi and his wife, Patrizia, for their friendship and for introducing me to the world of the Palio and the Contrada of San Giacomo, whose faithful re-enactments of Estense ceremonial occasions evoke the days when Eleonora and Ercole walked those same streets. With them I have discovered that a strong sense of the Renaissance pervades the lovely streets and buildings Ferrara, a sense of place that has been a source of inspiration and encouragement even when the challenge of transcribing and translating fifteenth-century documents seemed insurmountable.

To my children, Jonathan, Sarah and Christian and their partners I say a big thank you for supporting me and for telling me that you were proud of me when my spirits flagged and it seemed that the goal that I had set myself was unattainable. To my dear little grand-children, Lachlan and Sienna, I hope that what your “Nanny” has done may be an inspiration to you both as you look at your own options in life and that you will remember it’s never too late to follow a different path.

My biggest debt of gratitude is to my wonderful husband, David, who has been my rock throughout the whole period of my research, cheerfully supporting me both emotionally and financially during my visits to Ferrara and Modena, when he also managed to become extremely competent as a photographer of historical documents. Never complaining about my omissions on the domestic front and constantly reassuring me that I could and would finish this work. No one could have been more loving or understanding.

Diana Rowlands Bryant
Sydney, Australia, 2011.