NATIONAL LITERATURE, REGIONAL MANIFESTATIONS

CONTEMPORARY INDONESIAN LANGUAGE POETRY FROM WEST JAVA

IAN FRANK CAMPBELL

A thesis submitted in fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Philosophy, School of Languages and Cultures, University of Sydney

June, 2006
CONTENTS

Acknowledgements
Preface
Chapter 1
   Geographical and theoretical context
Chapter 2
   Poets, associations and literary festivals
   The local and regional setting
Chapter 3
   Localism and environmental themes
   Some key threads in contemporary Indonesian language poetry from West Java
Chapter 4
   Mystery, allusion and realism
   Beyond the local in the poetry of Nenden Lilis Aisyah
Chapter 5
   Mysticism, aestheticism and activism
   Towards the universal in the poetry of Acep Zamzam Noor
Conclusion
Appendix A
   Biographical notes on poets
Appendix B
   List of poets included in the anthology
   Muktamar: antologi puisi penyair jabar
Bibliography
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

With a sense of gratitude it is fitting that I acknowledge the contributions of the many people who contributed in some way to the completion of this thesis. It is also my earnest hope that they will also share the achievement in its completion.

The contributions of my Supervisor, Dr Keith Foulcher, and my Assistant Supervisor, Emeritus Professor Peter Worsley, have been invaluable as I have gradually worked through each stage of the development and completion of the thesis in a field of interest that arose for me in years well after I had undertaken undergraduate studies in Indonesian Studies. Each has broadened my horizons yet at the same time encouraged scholarly attention to the logic and detail inherent in my academic quest.

I also appreciate the interest and comments along the way by a number of other Australian academics. In particular, I thank Dr Harry Aveling and Dr Wendy Mukherjee for their scholarly interest in my work. Both persons encouraged me to undertake research in a field to which they have already made their own distinctive contributions over the years.

A number of chapters in the thesis in their initial stages were the subject of papers which were presented at conferences in Australia. In particular, papers were presented at conferences, primarily those sponsored by the Asian Studies Association of Australia and its constituent organization, the Indonesia Council. I thank the conference convenors for the opportunity to present these papers and also the attendees for their comments and suggestions.
Of course, in a fundamental way the thesis could not have been completed without the contribution of Indonesian poets and literary critics whose work and offerings to their society forms the basis for my research. It is with a deep sense of humility that I approach my task and a feeling of admiration for their achievements. I hope that my own research will be of interest to them in the years ahead.

I also acknowledge the separate contributions of particular families in Jakarta and Bandung with whom I have stayed over the years. They have followed my progress with a sense of apprehension, and perhaps pride, as I gradually sought to enter a literary world far removed from my initial interests when, as a young undergraduate, I first visited Indonesia in the 1970s. Their friendship and support has sustained me greatly.

My gratitude to my immediate family is immense. Their generosity of spirit and support has enabled me to undertake not only the present work but also my research during the 1980s which culminated with the awarding of the degree of Master of Arts, for a thesis entitled ‘Family Law and Inheritance Law in West Java: Change and Continuity in the period 1900 to the Present’. To Luz Sarno and Caroline Campbell-Sarno, I give my heartfelt thanks. Perhaps the words of Pablo Neruda, Nobel Prize winner for literature, have also acted as a source of encouragement along the way: “Hoy puede ser el comienzo de algo hermoso” (Maybe today will be the start of something beautiful).
PREFACE

This thesis has its genesis in a number of sources. Although I had undertaken postgraduate research in the 1980s on the history of family and inheritance law in West Java, I had not taken a close interest in the development of literature in Indonesia. Allied with my developing general interest in the 1990s in poetry and literature, although not specifically Indonesian language literature, it was the advent of the internet revolution -- for myself in early 2001 -- that convinced me that there was a great deal occurring in Indonesian literature that was accessible through internet press as well as book publications. My interests in writing original poetry in English, and later in Indonesian, led me to the conclusion that I should deepen my knowledge and appreciation of modern Indonesian literature, particularly poetry. Given my earlier research and visits to West Java it also seemed natural that I should focus on literary developments in that province. The result has been the current thesis which was completed over the period 2002 to 2006.

As my Bibliography indicates I have relied primarily on Indonesian and English language book publications as sources for material. However, a considerable amount of material is derived from the Indonesian language press, primarily in internet but also printed form, over the period 2001 to 2006. In particular, the Bandung mass media publication Pikiran Rakyat has been important as a source of material about developments in poetry writing in West Java. The current thesis is unusual in the field of research into contemporary Indonesian literature in that it has tried to take account of literary material appearing in the press. This approach is not without its pitfalls, but I believe in the case of the intersection of the local and regional with the global, it is an approach that will be seen to be increasingly fruitful as a ‘meeting point’, between the oral and printed cultures of a geographical area.
The poems that appear in this thesis are to be found in publications by the authors or in anthologies that are in the public domain. No poems have been used that have not been published at least in Indonesian mass media. More often than not they represent key works by the poets concerned that have found publication in book or anthology form many times over. In so far as the English translations of these poems is concerned, unless specifically acknowledged as derived from earlier versions by others, these translations represent new or first translations, by myself. If other versions existed, I was not aware of them, and hence could not take into account the insights they may contain. In some cases, which are acknowledged in the thesis, I have noted previous translations by other literary translators and where I felt they needed to be altered, I have done so. The result is a new translation of a poem, where the work of the previous translator is acknowledged. In part, this reflects my own beliefs about the dialectic nature of literary translations. Each new translator will see new meaning or insights that all others, including myself, may not have appreciated or which can be expressed more clearly and accurately in English.

In so far as stylistic conventions are concerned, I followed my sense of what seemed most appropriate in each case. In referring to the works by literary critics, I have generally referred to them in the thesis by their full name or by their surnames, where the shortened version of the name is appropriate. However, where I refer to the poets themselves, I have generally used their full name or their first names, where a shortened version of the name is appropriate. I believe this follows the convention of current academic discourse when referring to poets about their works.

Regarding the references I make in the text to the various literary festivals or gatherings of poets. I have decided to use the original names in Indonesian in italicized form rather than attempt an English gloss, even though a full explanation in English of developments and the meaning in English is given. In part, this has occurred because of the nature and meaning of the Indonesian words used. For example, the words muktamar or cakrawala have no direct generally accepted equivalents in English. While some of the Indonesian words used come close to direct English equivalents it seemed best to opt for consistency in the text at this point in time.

Terms in English for religious or spiritual concepts derived from the Indonesian can also be quite fraught with difficulty in getting the balance right in this respect too. The stance taken in this thesis is the expectation that some words such as santri or pesantren are now readily known in that form and I have not italicized these kinds of words in the text. In so far as the term Sufi is concerned, I have adopted the convention of generally using the term capitalized but not italicized, in English. This follows current general usage in English, although there are times in the text when I have felt that use of the lower case gets closer to the nuance that appears in much Indonesian writing and essays on the theme. However, for consistency’s sake I have followed the general convention in English usage.

Finally, this thesis has been written with an eye to the future. We need to deepen our knowledge of the literary and cultural worlds of those with whom we share our Asian-Pacific future. If the thesis can make a useful contribution in this direction it will be an encouraging outcome for all of us.