The expanding Jerusalem seeds and spices markets allow visitors and residents to wander atop the city's rooftops, buying and selling goods while surveying the city itself on a scenic boardwalk.

The market is accessed from ground level via stairs incised into the sides of existing buildings or via lifts reaching down into courtyards. The journey to the marketplace itself is an adventure. The shape of the market responds to the existing architecture of the block as it becomes incommensurate with its surroundings. People can hop off the boardwalk onto rooftops, exploring the markets from all angles.

Attachable market stalls can be placed between pre-existing walls along the boardwalk so the market continues to grow. These market stalls are designed specifically to the vendor's desire.

This market aims to counteract common sentiments of claustrophobia, a cramped atmosphere, and the hidden nature of regular markets. It is open, exposed to the elements, and allows light to pass through it.
